Books:

The Great Leap Backward: Forgetting and Representing the Mao Years. New York: Cambria Press, 2020.

Comment: The Great Leap Backward explores how generational memory functions in accounts of trauma, and how the signification of such interplay bears witness to historical calamities such as the Great Famine created by the Great Leap Forward and the Cultural Revolution that took place in China during the Maoist era. After four decades since the end of the Cultural Revolution, the outpouring of memory discourses of this era has given rise to a “crisis of memory,” as articulated by Susan Rubin Suleiman (2006). Representations of the Maoist past have reached this point of “crisis” as we now witness competing memory discourses between the Party-government version and the popular media display of nostalgia. Such a crisis can also be detected in representations of and reflections on personal memories in private and imaginative memory writings alike. This book aims at creating a new interpretive frame for better understanding what this memory crisis signifies in the collective remembering and forgetting of the Maoist era. The Great Leap Backward: Forgetting and Representing the Mao Years is the first study to leverage the singular contribution of Holocaust studies to the broader field of memory studies in order to establish an interpretive framework for reading memory writings of the Mao era.

Writing Chinese: Reshaping Chinese Cultural Identity. New York: Palgrave Macmillan Publishing, 2006.

Comment: Writing Chinese explores the question of cultural identity— of discovering or rediscovering who we are as cultural beings. The monograph examines a spectrum of contemporary writers, variously identified as “Chinese,” who leveraged their experience with identity struggles amidst waves of cultural globalization. The issue of dis/claiming ‘Chineseness’ is the axis of the book’s investigation of the nature of cultural identity in the context of global/local dynamics. My monograph works towards a theoretical framework for a trans-national cultural identity. A study of literary narrative that assesses the impact of globalization on cultural identity, this monograph situates the various texts by writers from China, Taiwan, Hong Kong, the Chinese-American community, and the Chinese diasporas, and examines how geopolitical locales, boundary-crossing, and one's cultural heritage affect the conception of cultural identity within the relevant historical context.

Comment: This is a Chinese translation by Jiangfeng Hu of the above Writing Chinese: Reshaping Chinese Cultural Identity. It is an expanded version of the book.

Memory Crisis in the Cold War: Nationalist Cultural Policies and Nationalist Cultural Policies and Literary Production in Taiwan during 1950s and 1960s (work-in-progress).

Comment: This project focuses on Taiwan's literary production and the Nationalist (Kuomintang) government's cultural policies during the height of the Cold War, particularly the 1950s and 60s. Following the February 28 Incident of 1947, it was the Nationalist government's Sino-centric cultural and education policies that led to Taiwan's more than seventy years of ethnic conflicts and intense identity politics. My study centers on how Nationalist cultural policies have affected literary works by first-generation Chinese mainland writers and by first-generation post-Japanese colonial Taiwanese writers. My exploration foregrounds the interplay between memory and identity, center and periphery, and Cold War geopolitics and neocolonial negotiation and resistance.
